MISCELLANEOUS.

A'FAITHFUL DOG.

It has been said that all Indian wars have had the same origin, and on examining the subject, a great deal of truth will be found in the remark. For a long time the United States failed rightly to understand the Seminoles of Florida. In 1817-'18 General Jackson devastated a portion of the territory and scattered them to the woods and everglades. This led to the belief that they were weak and few in number, a belief which, a few years later, they most effectually exploded.

At the beginning of 1835 it was announced that the Commissioners of the United States Government had met a delegation of the principal chiefs of the Southern Indians, and made a treaty, the articles of which were satisfactory to the

As the venerable historian, Drake, remarks, there are several queries that present themselves to the intelligent mind upon such an announcement as this: By what means were these chiefs gotten together? How many were they? What portion of the Southern tribes did they represent? What other chiefs and principal men did not participate in the proceedings?

Had these queries been properly inswered in the early border wars n the different Florida wars, and in those that occured a few years ago in Minnesota, the true cause of all the trouble would have been found. Dishonest agents, the use of that irresistable foe to the North American Indians—fire-wateravarice of men occupying official positions, the persistent fraud of traders, and the unlawful encroachments of settlers—these have been the fruitful cause of border wars, and will continue so to be as long as a remnant of the aborigines have a foothold upon this continent.

A few years ago, in making a treaty with the Sioux of the Northwest, fifty-five thousand dollars of the money paid went to a man named Hugh Tyler, for getting the treaty through the Senate, and for 'necessary disbursements" in gaining the consent of the chiefs.

In 1857, a trader, by deceiving the Indians as to what they were signing, received twelve thousand dollars for his private pocket. In their reservation north of the Minnesota River for one hundred and sixty thousand dollars. Four years after, they received fifteen thousand dollars in goods. In another case eight hundred thousand acres of land were sold, for which they never received a farthing.

The proceedings of the Sioux when they aroused, were inhuman in the extreme, and deserved the severest penalty; but the provocation, in the first place, came from the other side, and the consequences of the bad policy pursued toward them REAL ESTATE. were seen from the first by thou-

It is our purpose, however, in in the brief space alloted us, to give an incident of the Seminole war, one of the hundred of events that are the inevitable accompaniments of such a sanguinary strife.

The Seminole war lasted seven years, although they were never able to bring into the field more than two thousand warriors, two hundred and fifty of whom were their own negro slaves. The United States sent more than twenty thousand men against them, and paid $20,000,000 to militia and volunteers, exclusive of the expenditures of the regular army. Bloodhounds were employed to trail them through the everglades; a reward of two hundred dollars was given for every Indian killed; seven or eight hundred Creek Indians were employed to assist the whites; the best generals in the service were in command, including General Scott and, at last, the United States were compelled to abandon the attempt to remove all the Seminoles from the country, and were obliged to make a treaty with them.

In that portion of Florida which bordered on the scenes of the Seminole war, dwelt Uriah Crawford, his wife, infant child, and a huge dog of the Newfoundland species. This creature well deserves the mention made of him, as will be admitted before we have done.

As the Seminoles grew more audacious, and the call for volunteers increased in urgency, Crawford joined the army, and followed in a vain pursuit of a body of the enemy, with such celerity that the soldiers only now and then caught a glimpse of them, as they reined up their horses upon some distant eminence and made taunting gestures to them.

Mrs. Crawford was left alone with her infant, and her great dog, who bore the poetic name of Bowser. Her husband would never left post her had he not fully known the and by the states qualities of this animal, whose courage and faithfulness would not allow him to desert his mistress, no matter what peril menaced her.

As for Mrs. Crawford, she felt little apprehension. The Seminoles, as yet had never been in the immediate neighborhood, and her house stood on a lonely creek, the tributary of a small river, and was so concealed by the luxuriant vegetation, trees and undergrowth, that there was hardly a possibility of its being discerned except by the merest accident. Then Bowser never left the vicinity of the house, and would not fail to apprise her of all approaching danger. She had an abundance of provisions at hand, and so, singing cheerily, she went about her work, and every morning and evening sank upon her knees and asked the protection of the great Being in whose mercy and kindness she placed her entire re-

The first two days passed without disturbance, but on the second evening she was rendered uncomfortable and uneasy by hearing the discharge of several guns at no great distance in the woods. She sarred her doors and secured her windows, then retired to rest; but the night passed away without any recurrence of the alarming sounds.

On the afternoon of the third day she was sitting near the door, and Bowser, who was stretched in front of her, apparently asleep, suddenly raised his head, and looked out toward the wood, giving utterance at the same time to a low peculiar whine. The next instant he bounded out of the door, plunged into the oushes and disappeared.

The sagacity of the faithful creature convinced Mrs. Crawford that he had discerned the approach of omething-whether a white man, ndian, negro, or animal, it was impossible to tell; but under the circumstances, she judged it the part of prudence to close the door and pass to the upper window, where she could make all the observations she chose without fear of discovery.

She had been there but a few moments, when the dog made his appearance and claimed admittance by scratching at the door. She lost no time in opening it, then looked down in the dog's face, as if to ask him what he had seen. His reply was by taking her dress in his teeth and pulling her outside, a most urgent invitation to accompany him to some point close at hand. Mrs. Crawford smiled and resisted him to est his earnestness; but Bowser would not be denied. He whined gagee, would not be denied. He whined and ran to and fro around her, then caught her skirt in his mouth and pulled her again.

"Well, Bowser, I will go with you," said she. "So don't tear my dress."

As she stepped from the door she thought of her child, lying asleep in the cradle. Could she leave that even for the space of a few minutes? She paused for a moment in doubt. She had frequently done so, and why not now? She looked carefully about her, served from where she stood.

She scrutinized the suspicious object for some time, but saw no signs of life around it. It was a small birchen vessel, such as are used by Indians to carry one or two of their number, and the bow overlapped the shore only by a few inches, sufficiently to retain such a delicately constructed thing from floating away. At first she fancied there was one of the dreadful Seminoles in the bottom, but a moment's scrutiny of the cause satisfied her that it was too small to admit of such a posture without revealing him who took it. Then the question arose as to how long the boat had been there. Was it a few hours, a day, or only a few minutes?

Nerve force produced by the brain and conveyed means of the nerves to the various organs the body, thus supplying the latter with vitality necessary to insure their health. The pneumogastric nerve, as shown here, may be said to be the most important of the entire nerve system, as it supplies the heart, lungs, stomach, bowels, etc., with the nerve force necessary to keep them active and healthy. As will be seen by the cutthe long nerve descending from the base of the brain and terminating in the bowels is the pneumogastric, while the pneumogastric, while the neumogastric.

When the brain becomes in any way disordered by irritability or exhaustion, the nerve force which it supplies is lessened, and the organs receiving the diminished supply are consequently weakened.

Physicians generally fail to recognize the importance of this fact, but treat the organ itself instead of the cause of the trouble the importance of this fact, but treat the organ itself instead of the cause of the trouble. The noted specialist, Franklin Miles, M. D. LL. B., has given the greater part of his lift to the study of this subject, and the principal discoveries concerning it are due to his effort.

The Newfoundland wheeled around, ran to the door, snuffed the ground, and away he went like a meteor into the woods, the distraught mother hurrying after.

Ten minutes later there was sharp yelp, and Mrs. Crawford, whose great fear lent wings to her feet, descried a tall, sinewy Seminole glance over his shoulder at the dog that had announced his approach.

The Indian was in his war-paint and looked as hideous as it is possible to imagine a barbarian under any circumstances whatever. He was taking long, rapid strides, when the rustling of the bushes betrayed the approach of his enemy, and he turned about to face him.
